

Solicitor wins on advocate's immunity and statute of limitation

By PETER MORAN and ROLAND EVERINGHAM

Two recent Court of Appeal decisions strengthen solicitors' protections.

Advocate's immunity

The principle of advocate's immunity – as it applies to solicitors – has long been the subject of legal controversy. In the recent decision of Donnellan v Woodland [2012] NSWCA 433, the Court of Appeal held the immunity could extend to advice given by a solicitor to commence or settle litigation.

In Donnellan, the solicitor acted for a client in a dispute with a local council over the subdivision of land. As a condition of approval, the council required the provision of an on-site stormwater detention system. In an effort to circumvent the condition, the client sought a drainage easement over adjoining property owned by the council. When that was refused, proceedings were commenced in the Supreme Court seeking an easement under s.88K of the Conveyancing Act 1919.

During the course of the retainer, the solicitor provided advice on the prospects of success, potential costs consequences and whether settlement offers made by the council should be accepted. The tenor of the advice was that the client had good prospects and should recover his legal costs. The solicitor recommended counter offers be made.

As events turned out, there was no settlement and the case ran to trial. The council prevailed in the litigation. Hamilton J ordered the client to pay the council's costs, partly on an indemnity basis.

The client subsequently brought professional negligence proceedings against the solicitor and succeeded at first instance. Hume J held that the solicitor's advice in respect of liability and costs exposure – particularly in relation to the settlement offers – constituted a breach of the solicitor's duty of care. The trial judge ordered the solicitor to pay costs, including costs incurred by the council in the earlier proceedings. The solicitor appealed the judgment.

Appeal

The Court of Appeal held the solicitor had not breached his duty. However, the greatest significance of the decision lies in the court's consideration of the principle of advocate's immunity or perhaps, as it was more aptly described by Basten AJ, "practitioner's immunity".

In 2005, the High Court in D'Orta-Ekenaike v Victoria Legal Aid [2005] HCA 12 confirmed that advocate's immunity extends to a solicitor acting in litigation if the solicitor's negligent conduct constitutes work done out of court that leads to a decision affecting the conduct of the case in court.

In Donnellan, the Court of Appeal considered the trial

"Advice given on commencement or settlement of proceedings are matters which affect the conduct of litigation and therefore attract the immunity."

judge was (wrongly) of the view that advice to commence or continue the proceedings should not be protected by immunity because the advice did not bear on the "conduct of the case in court" or "on the way that case is to be conducted" (at [221]).

The issue, the Court of Appeal found, is not when the advice is given but whether the advice, or the failure to give advice, led to a decision to continue with the case, or meant that the case was continued because of that omission. In either circumstance the conduct leads to a decision affecting the conduct of the case in court, namely its continuance by way of full argument before a judge.

Peter Moran is a partner and Roland Everingham is a special counsel at Colin Biggers & Paisley. Both are LawCover panel solicitors.

The decision in Donnellan applies the principles enunciated by the High Court in Giannarelli v Wraith [1988] HCA 52 and D'Orta. It is of significance to practitioners, and solicitors in particular, because it confirms that advice given on commencement or settlement of proceedings are matters which affect the conduct of litigation and therefore attract the immunity.

Statute of Limitation

In D'Agostino v Anderson [2012] NSWCA 443, 21 December 2012, the Court of Appeal clarified the issue of when time commences to run in "failing to explain" cases against solicitors where purchasers/clients contend they have entered into contracts based upon incomplete or negligent advice.

Kerrie and David Anderson exchanged contracts for the purchase of a chiropractic business, and the premises from which it operated, in September 2003. Completion of both contracts occurred in November 2003.

Eight months later, in July

FORENSIC
DOCUMENT
SERVICES Pty Ltd

The forensic examination of handwriting, documents and fingerprints *rigorous scientific analysis, impartiality,

strict quality assurance*

Phone: (02) 9977 0266
examined@thefdsgroup.com.au
www.forensicdocument.com.au